Dark grays have low, median gray medium, and light grays high, brilliance. Chromatic, as well as achromatic, colors differ from each other in brilliance. Chromatic colors differ from each other also in hue and saturation. Thus, any color can be specified in terms of these three attributes, hue, saturation, and brilliance. Hue is that attribute in respect to which colors may be described as red, yellow, green, or blue, or as intermediate between two of these, as, red-yellow denotes a hue equally resembling red and yellow. Saturation is that attribute in respect to which colors may be differentiated as being higher or lower in degree of vividness of hue; that is, as differing in degree from gray. Thus, emerald is a color, yellow-green in hue, of medium saturation and medium brilliance. Certain standard analyses showing sets of primary colors, that is, colors in terms of which all other colors may be described or from which all other colors may be evoked by mixture, differ from the above; as, the physiological, or fundamental, primaries are red, green, and blue; the psychological primaries are red, yellow, green, blue, black, and white; in painting, red, blue, and yellow are the primaries. 3. Specif., a chromatic color. 4. Complexion; specif.: a A healthful or ruddy complexion. b A blush. c The hue or complexion of men not classed as white; esp., the complexion of Negroes. 5. Coloring matter; a pigment or dye. 6. pl. A dis-

Syn. Color (or colour), chroma, hue, shade, tint, tinge mean a property of a thing visible only in light. The elementary particles of electricity, the electron and the proton, are opposites electrically. Electricity of which the elementary unit is the electron is called negative electricity; electricity of which the elementary unit is the proton is called positive electricity. If a substance has on its surface more protons than electrons it is said to be charged with positive electricity. The quantity of an electric charge may be measured, the practical unit being the coulomb.
